Healing 1.0: A Tale of Two Coma Patients

A few months ago, Sam's family asked me if I would go to the hospital to give him a hands-on healing. They were concerned he might soon be transitioning, but also hoped that something could be done to restore him to health.

Sam had gone to a hospital emergency room as a relatively healthy 68-year-old. But a minor infection became septic and a life-threatening infection ravaged his body. By the time the family called me, he had been in a coma for six weeks. While the infection had abated, his doctors discovered that Sam had suffered a severe stroke sometime during his battle. They predicted that he would be brain-dead--if he survived.

When I laid hands on Sam, I brought him into a very high energy state. When he was infused with light, I asked him, soul to soul, what he wanted. If he could respond at all, I expected he was going to tell me that he wanted to pass as quickly as possible out of his body. But to my surprise, he told me by soul communication that he very much wanted to live. As the healing continued, I held space for a high flow state that would awaken him, and could feel his limbs become energized and ready for sentient motion.

Fortunately for Sam, his family asked me to do a second healing. This time I could feel that he was rising to consciousness. In the days afterward, the family reported that he seemed more aware and had more moments where he opened his eyes. After the third healing, Sam woke up. Although he had paralysis on one side of his body, his personality and force of will and mind were all very much intact. The doctors and nurses considered Sam a miracle. Within ten days of returning to consciousness he was well enough to move to a convalescent home.

In one of those remarkable "coincidences" of the universe, while I was witnessing and assisting Sam in his recovery, I got a request from a family to do a healing for their 10-year-old daughter. She had been a healthy child until she developed uncontrollable seizures a few weeks earlier. By the time they brought her to the hospital, she was already slipping away. Doctors couldn't find any reason for her seizures. Nor could they stop them.

When I did the healing, I found her seizures to be quite violent, but I could sense that she was still present. I also detected some kind of infection--most likely a virus that had eluded detection--and started to work to clear it. I couldn't stop the seizures in that first healing and encouraged the family to try a few more healings. In the meantime, I went back into a healing state and was able to “ground” the seizures, thus pulling some of the energy from her head. I also felt, given time, energy could transmute the infection. That gave me hope that she could be helped. But the doctors had told the family that their little girl was already as good as gone. And they chose not to try another healing. The last I heard the girl is still in a coma.

I have deeply contemplated these two different outcomes: A person in his 60s who is mentally restored, and a 10-year-old child who is still lying in a coma. Is it fate? Is it karma? Could healings have saved the little girl? Did healings make all the difference for Sam?

I tend to think that Sam was probably never quite as brain damaged as doctors imagined. Still, I know the healings did something for Sam, bringing him out of his coma more quickly and easily, and perhaps more completely, than might otherwise have been the case. As for the little girl, I might wish the family had been willing to go against the odds. While I have had very good luck helping coma patients come back, it has always taken more than one healing. But I’ll never know what healings might or might not have done for this child. Although I held her in my prayers, I could not continue to do healings that the family did not want. I had to respect the family’s wishes for her medical care.

One thing I can say is that such experiences certainly keep a healer humble. We offer to serve, but in the end we are only servants to the higher forces and decrees.
