November 2013 Healing 101: Healing Cancer

Recently I've been contemplating a healing I did some years ago. I was called to do a healing for Lynn, a woman in her early thirties, who had Stage 4 breast cancer. The cancer had permeated her bones. When I got to her house, I saw that Lynn had almost no life force. She could hardly walk from a couch to a bed in the very same room. I thought she had a few weeks left, if she was lucky.

We talked for a few minutes about her life. Her parents had passed recently, and she had three young children. I assumed that the healing might be about preparing her for her transition. But as I laid hands on her, the healing went in a completely different direction.

I was shown how much Lynn missed her parents. I could see that she had been so attached to them that she wanted to be reunited as soon as possible. I was guided to show her that her three young children needed her, and that this was truly where her commitment and focus needed to be. I also ran light throughout her body, to bring new health and radiance.

I didn't hear from the family again immediately. But I soon learned that after that one healing, Lynn's cancer went into total remission. She lived cancer free for a few years, and altogether lived another five years, long enough to guide her children through most of high school.

Lynn's case is quite exceptional. But such healings do happen. Cancer is a complex illness, but there is always profound healing that can be done. As with any challenge that crosses our path, if we see it as a gift from God, an opportunity for soul advancement, we are aligned with the highest light.
