September 2014 Healing 101: BASAL CELL CARCINOMA

Recently Henry came to me for a healing. He had several issues. Should he move? He was living in a farming community, surrounded by crops that were regularly sprayed with pesticides. And, second, should he drink the water that came through his tap? It tasted like arsenic. Henry also had a history of basal cell carcinoma.

Before going into a deep state of meditation, I pulled out my first book, How People Heal, to look at a scientific study on basal cell carcinoma that I wrote about. It was only a pilot study, involving 9 people with basal cell carcinoma. But it was a study financed by the National Institutes of Health and the results were fascinating.

There it was, just as I recalled: One of the people in the study, who had had many basal cell carcinomas, was a man who had been exposed to arsenic through pesticides. The study also showed that the carcinomas may have an emotional component. (In Ask Diane, I share the entire study. See below.)

When I did the healing, I held light for Henry to find the answers to his life questions. It will take time for him to sort everything out. But in the meantime, he had scientific support for his concerns about the drinking water. He might not be able to stop showering in the water, but he can certainly use bottled water for drinking--and perhaps reduce his risk of recurring basal cell carcinoma.
